Advantages of Living Alone

There is a popular saying that goes that no one is an island and that a man is a social animal. The only difference between a man and other animals is not his ability to coordinate his psychomotor and do constructive work, nor is it his intelligence. It is his gift of parole. No other animal can communicate using a common lingua franca. When they want to communicate, they do so through the strength of their limbs, horns or canines which make them barbaric and savagery. A human being lives in a society with other people and the warmth in numbers is happiness in itself. But the big question has been; must we live together with our partners so that we can prove to be social animals with a gift of parole? Psychologists have argued that people get married for three major reasons. For companionship, to procreate and for sexual enjoyment. But do we have to be married or live together to achieve all this?

For starters, many people claim that living alone makes one feel comfortable since one is not answerable to anybody about when to come home or leave. One feels the sense of total control. The biggest huddle, especially for men, is to have somebody at home who would ask them where they were and the time they are expected back at their own home. They usually feel that they would rather not have someone tying them at home to micromanage them like a project. If they want to go out there and have some good time with the boys, then they can leave without a worry of pressurizing phone call of the time they are planning to go back home. On the same note, men are known not to be sticklers for cleanliness. They hate to be bothered by being told to keep their things in order. According to them, life is just a busy roundabout in traffic. There is order in the chaos and that is what makes life interesting. In actual sense, they know where everything is and they, therefore, do not need somebody to plan their life which they prefer to live in a disorganized manner.

On the other hand, ladies sometimes prefer to live alone because the majority of men are violent. Many people in relationships are in a constant state of war. It could either be physical or psychological. Many ladies who are in a relationship or who are married are stuck in abusive relationships because they are afraid of stigmatization in the society. In fact, statistics indicate that 37% of ladies in America are single by choice. This is in a background of a society with a divorce rate of 13,000 per 100,000 marriages (Rotz, 980). Just like Chinua Achebe said that when the birds knew that the shooters are shooting with no missing, they flew with no perching. Their argument has been that marriage is not organizing a ceremony successfully and inviting friends and relatives for the most expensive lunch you will ever host in your life. What is successful in marriage is whether both of you are compatible with each other. Signing a piece of paper cannot be considered as an achievement.

I strongly advocate for grown-ups to live alone but live together as a society. After all, we spend the better part of our lives while we are actively involved in our daily activities either in the office or while doing our hobbies. The time we spend in our houses should be dedicated to our privacy, rather than spend it with nagging women or violent men. Living alone is the solution to this inability quagmire.
